Should Teach Artificial Respiration

In The School To Senior Pupils
The extraordinary publicity given by the press to the Health League of Canada's campaign for the resuscitation of the apparently drowned has had the effect of creating a widespread interest in the subject. For mer views, in the light of experience, have become modified. For example it was common opinion that a person under water for more than four minutes was beyond medical aid. There are numerous examples where persons have been revived after having been under water even for 30 minutes.

It is most important in cases of apparent drowning that there be someone on the spot who understands the technique of artificial respiration and who has enough faith in the value of the procedure to "stick-it-out" until rigor mortis sets in or the patient breathes.

The approved method is the prone or Schafer method. This method has been so well described and illustrated in the newspapers all over the country that most persons are familiar with it. In order that there may always be someone at hand to use the method it has been suggested that it be systematically taught to all senior pupils, both girls and boys, in the schools. It is very simple. Any intelligent boy or girl can learn all about it in a few minutes. Accidents of the kind do not always hapupon at convenient bathing beaches adjacent to great cities. Drownings are liable to occur in the most remote places. How important then it is that every person should be able to use artificial respiration! The only way by which knowledge of its use will become universal is through instruction in the schools.

In some cases of drowning there is spasm of the larynx. In others again the may be foam in the lungs. The former may be overcome by the passage of a catheter; the latter may be overcome by the use of certain drugs. These are matters for a doctor, but artificial respiration in competent hands may have saved the victim's life before the doctor has arrived.—By John W. B. McCullough, M.D., D.P.H.

Initials Are Important

There are certain rules on all papers, worked out through long experience, to which most items must be made to conform. For instance, you may have said that "Rev. Smith was the chief speaker." Most editors wouldn't allow that to go unchanged. You might be surprised to know how long one might hunt around just trying to find out Whether it was "insane," "Bible" or "the Rev. Robert Smith," even in the case where it is not derogatory when people are mentioned and those plain "Mr. Smith" would be quite grammatically correct, yet the readers of the newspapers would like to know whether the man referred to was Willie Smith (now William, of course) who used to go to school at S. S. No. 6, or was the son of old Ebenezer Smith who lived over on the seventh.

By using a new horn, truck drivers in Germany may warn car drivers that they wish to pass. If it's one is pitched so high that the car cannot hear it. It is picked up in a microphone installed in the automobile, the driver of which hears it as a pleasant humming. When the car driver hears the signal he puts on his rear tail light, and when it is possible for the truck to pass he changes the red light to green.
